That Christian performance has (on the whole) been remarkably abusive is fairly obvious to any casual reader of history. The agony of discovery in *Imagination* issues from its exposure of just how deeply Western theology is infected, and how subtle warps in our faith provided generous space for domination.

Currently my favorite book on theology and race, "The Christian Imagination" does a masterful job of showing how Christianity is made synonymous with the work and logic of colonialism. Jennings argues that Christianity functions inside of a diseased social imagination that is inept to rethink its relationship to place, language, and intimacy.

This is the Psalm reading for the last Sunday of the liturgical year, Christ the King Sunday. I've paired it with an Ottonian miniature from around 1015, which shows Christ, framed by a mandorla (an almond-shaped aureole), standing in a branched tree of life. The gold-leaf outline of this glory cloud encompasses heaven (Caelus, the top figure) and earth (Terra, aka Terrus, at bottom), two ...

WILLIE JAMES JENNINGS' BOOK, The Christian Imagination: Theology and the Origins of Race, is a revolutionary study in the ongoing conversation of the relation between race and Christian theology and practice. In my essay, I discuss key themes of the book, which include: the connection between land and identity, the role of whiteness as an evaluative form or racialized lens for interpreting ...

David Tracy is one of the most important of contemporary American Roman Catholic theologians. Indeed, this impressive book establishes him as a systematic theologian of international and ecumenical importance. In this book Tracy is not 'doing' systematic theology, but describing what systematic theology is and should be, its task and methods, its criteria of adequacy, its place within the ...
